

The Attorney General of Indiana has informed us about a lawsuit to negate the State of Indiana do not call law. The FCC should should not allow this to occur. States rights are supposed to be a cornerstone of the Constitution. All too many of these rights have been trampled by private interest groups. As a state we created our own law long before the federal government created a do-not-call law. The federal law was watered down by special interest groups. If I do not want to receive telemarketer calls at home, I believe that I should have the right to block them. The Indiana law makes this possible. I realize that people make a living making these invasive telephone calls, but I do not want them. We outlaw breaking and entering into the physical building. Why is an unwanted telephone call that takes me away from whatever I was doing or interrupts my dinner any different than a breaking and entering activity. The FCC should stand up for consumers. Do not stand up for private interest groups.
